

I can tolerate most of the sex, violence, inane programming, and canned laughter on television. However, I have to draw the line at downright blasphemy. I cringe every time I hear the phrase "OH MY GOD" on television. This has become so prevalent as to become bimbo chic language. I realize that I have the option of not watching programs where this blasphemy is uttered as part of routine conversation. However, this blasphemy is now used routinely during commercial breaks as part of the advertisements for these programs. Don't the networks have any standards regarding blasphemy? Isn't there anything the Federal Communications Commission can do to protect public airwaves from blasphemy, even in program advertisements? I am neither a religious fanatic nor a member of the "religious right". However, I was taught from an early age that reverence for the name of the Deity was part of our Judaeo-Christian tradition. Thank you.
